JFrog has released version 2.5 of Artifactory, the enterprise-grade Binary Repository that centralizes all aspects of managing software libraries. A major new feature in this release is support for the .NET NuGet packaging system.

Managing .NET packages with ease

 NuGet packages are now first class citizens in Artifactory, allowing you to point Visual Studio at Artifactory as a central point for all NuGet feeds. NuGet packages and can be proxied from the NuGet Gallery or any other remote feed and also be deployed and hosted using the Web UI, MSBuild or directly from your build server.

 NuGet users can now take advantage of Artifactory's proven enterprise features, like: powerful security with Active Directory integration, control over which packages can be used by developers, exposing different package views for different projects, sophisticated searches, powerful repository management, and build integration.

 "We are excited to work with the .NET community and believe that Artifactory is the missing piece for full .NET library management that can make the development process easier and complete the existing ecosystem," said Baruch Sadogursky, Developers Advocate with JFrog.

 NuGet intro

 NuGet is a free, open source package management system for the .NET platform that simplifies the process of managing third party libraries in a .NET application during development. NuGet automates the common tasks of incorporating third party packages as well as their dependencies into a project's source tree.
